London, Dec. 1732.

Dear SIR,

HE great Talk at present in this Place is about the Corporation and Test Acts. The Diffenters seem resolv'd to push for the Repeal of them this next Sessions; and they are consulting all the Measures, and making all the Friends they can for the effecting of it. Whether they will succeed or not, I find differently believ'd. What I hear said of the Matter, and my own Opinion about it, I send you in the following Sheets.

It is faid, and many specious Harangues have been made upon that Head, that the Test itself is a very improper one; as it may be, and often is, the Occasion of giving Scandal to our Holy Religion. It is true, the taking the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper merely for a Qualification to some secular Employment, is a great, and hardly to be pardon'd, Profanation of that holy Rite: because, as the Motives thereto are very unworthy, and confequently must render the Receiver unworthy; so the End of such receiving is quite foreign, and very different from that which our bleffed Lord ordain'd when he instituted that holy Sacrament. far is very certain, and agreed on all But then let us ask, and fairly fix the Charge where of right it belongs: Who it is that is properly guilty of that Profanation, the Legislator or the Receiver? The latter certainly; he whose own Act it is, he is highly guilty of it. And if the Diffenters any of them, notwithstanding the known Sacredness of that divine Institution, and the Danger of abusing it, will yet venture ture upon it, with no other View but that of a Qualification, they, of all Men, have the least Reason to charge others with the Prostitution, or the Profanation of it. The Defign of the Legislator was not to alter or to add to the End for which Christ himself ordained that Sacrament; but only thereby to distinguish the true Friends of the Establish'd Church, and to be a Bar against any who were not of her Communion, and in her Interest. This was all that was intended by the Legislator in the Case. And if those very People, whom that Act was on purpose calculated to keep out from ever being able to hurt the Church; if those People will pervert the Intention of that Act, and from either wrong or wicked Motives demand, as it were, that holy Sacrament to be deliver'd to them; as nothing can be more impious, or give greater Scandal to our holy Religion, fo the Sin thereof will be chiefly at their doors.

It is true, our bleffed Lord charges his Disciples, i. e. the Ministers of his Word, that they give not that which is holy holy unto dogs, nor cast their pearls before swine; lest, as his Reason is, they turn again and rend you*. The Reason, I think, is not unworthy our Attention in the present Case; and as no Power ought to interpose, where those Directions are duly observed, so the due Observation of them might be a Means of preventing, in great measure, that horrid Prostitution of the Sacrament so much complain'd of, tho' often caus'd, by the Dissenters.

Upon the whole; I think the receiving the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, as our Law requires, and after the Manner of the Church of England, to be a very proper Test, and such which (as long as that Part of our Establishment lasts) ought to be given by all who have any publick Power or Trust committed to them. If for the sake of any such Power or Trust, any shall dare to prosane it, let them look well to it: they are Volunteers in the Guilt, and their Condemnation must be certain.

* Matth. vii. б.

Others

Others of the Diffenters, whose Principle will not suffer them to give this Test, are angry with it, because without it they can have no Share in the Administration of Things, and the Places of Profit and Trust among us. Here they inveigh bitterly, and with great Indignation: For hereby, say they, we are persecuted for Conscience sake, and deprived of all those civil Rights, which, as Subjects in general, and as good Subjects in particular, naturally belong to us.

But this Complaint too is both ground-less and unreasonable. As Subjects in general, they have all the Indulgence, and all the Enjoyment both in their Civil and Religious Rights, which in Wisdom ought to be allowed them, and which in Justice and Reason they ought to claim.

As to their Religious Rights, they are fully tolerated both in the Profession, and in the Exercise of them. They are not only suffer'd to convene publickly, and to serve God in their own Way; but the Law also has provided Remedies against any, who shall interrupt or disturb them therein. And if in modesty they would but consider, that theirs is not the establish'd Religion of the Country they live in, they ought surely to be well contented, if not very thankful for the Liberty and the Privilege which by the Favour of the Legislature is allow'd them.

In other Countries and where other Religions prevail, all the Indulgence which the Diffenters meet with here is not to be found: And fince theirs is not, nor likely to be, they may be very thankfull that the Religion established is the established Religion. As the Case at present stands, and with regard to their Religious Rights, I see no Difference between the Diffenters and us; but that ours is the Religion established by Law, theirs tolerated by Law.

Then again as to their Civil Rights, where is there any Difference between a Churchman and a Diffenter? What a Diffenter is born to, what is bequeath'd to him, or what he acquires himself, he has as good a Right to, and is as fecure in, as any other Subject whatever: He has the fame Access to the Laws of the Land, and he may defend himfelf by them in any just Claim which he has. Where then is the Greivance so mightily complain'd of? Why, as good and faithful Subjects to the Government, they say that they ought to have an equal Share in the publick Administration of Things, and that as such, they have a natural Right to it.

But this Claim of a natural Right, as they call it, I hope will never be allow'd them; because, as the Case now is, they can have no Pretence to it. They boast indeed not only that they are Subjects in common, but that they are the best and most faithful Subjects His Majesty has; in the same manner as their Forefathers boafted, that they were the only Righteous, the only Men of God. And as these would have engross'd all the Merit of Righteousness, and all the Favour of God to themfelves; so our modern Presbyterians would fain extol and prefer their Loyalty into the greatest Merit from His B 2 present present Majesty, and the whole House of Hanover. Now supposing all this that they fay, (not that I grant it by any means; because His Majesty has a great many, and those in all respects his Best Friends and his Best Subjects, in the Church of which he himself is the Head:) I fay, supposing the Diffenters to be the good Subjects they boaft! And what of all that? Or how do they derive from thence a natural Right to the 'same Share in all publick Distributions with those of the Establish'd Religion? Their being good Subjects is no more than what His Majesty, so indulgent as He is to them, deserves and may claim from them: And it is not only their Duty, but it is their Interest, as well as it is ours of the Church of England, to be in a particular manner so to His present Majesty; since in Him only it is, and in His Royal Family, that both they and we are fecure from a Power, which if once it shou'd prevail, wou'd undo both them and us. What then have both they and we to do, but to be as loyal and as dutiful Subjects to Him as possibly we can? — But to fay that upon that account, and merely merely as fuch, the Diffenters have a natural Right to the same Favour, and the same Trusts with those of the Establish'd Church; and in a manner so insolent and threatning as they have done, to demand it (as it were) of the Government; this, I think, is going a great way farther than either Decency or good Politicks can justify.

The Government, let them observe, is in fuch Hands, and so secure in those Hands, that they who hold it are at least not to be bully'd into any Meafures, which may be detrimental to the present Constitution: and His Majesty is wife enough to distinguish between those who are of the whole Constitution, and those who comply with but a Part of it. And therefore, as there can be no Dispute who are his best Subjects, and consequently deserve best of him; those who go along with him in every Part of that Constitution over which He presides, and which He has engag'd to defend; and those who disfent wholly from it, or comply but in Part; so a Pretence to an equal Share in His Fayour, and in the Administration of things under Him, is altogether unreasonable to be ask'd, impolitick to be granted, and what they cannot have a Right to. For my own part, I think the Dissenters of all Denominations are pretty much upon a Level, as to this natural Right fo much talk'd of; and the Man who has not taken the Oaths to the Civil Government, but is a profess'd Member of the Church, may, in like manner, put in his Claim to it, and has not much less to fay for himself upon it. In short, the Laws in the present Case so much complain'd of, were made for the Security of the Church, as it now flands eftablish'd amongst us; well seeing that the Security of that Church would be the best Security to the State. But farther:

The Dissenters think themselves, or wou'd persuade us to think, that they are a numerous, a weighty, and a very powerful Body of Men in the Nation. Hence they wou'd have us believe, that they may have a great Stroke in our Elections; and because the present Parliament is drawing to an End, they think think this a proper Time to declare what must be expected from them, if they are disappointed in their Attempt. But, alas! they are ill-advis'd; and while they fuffer themselves, without confulting whether this be a proper Time for others, as well as for themfelves, and difregarding all Confent of those Persons in Power, who are best able to judge for, to affift, or to oppose them: I fay, while the Diffenters do thus fuffer themselves to be hurried on, even in Opposition, as it appears, to those very Persons, (who, as they are principally concern'd, fo they ought principally to be confulted in all publick Cases of this Nature:) They only become thereby the mere Tools of some discontented or ambitious Men, who have their own, not the Interest of the Diffenters to ferve in it.

As to the Dissenters being so great and so powerful a Body as they pretend; that, I think, need not alter any of our Laws, nor will hurt us any thing in our Elections. Those who are Friends to the Church are known Friends to His Majesty; and there are Churchmen enough throughout the Kingdom to chuse a Church-Parliament, which will best preserve His, and the Rights of His People, both in Church and State. And I will venture to fay, as to the Ministry, That if they had Reafon to apprehend the disobliging any of their Friends, the difobliging their Friends of the Church Establish'd, wou'd be of worse Consequence than any that is threaten'd from what other Quarter soever. But the Ministry has not, nor needs to have any Apprehenfions of this kind. Whilst the Ministy is a Friend to the Church, the Church will be a Friend to the Miniftry; and so long as there is that Harmony between them, they will mutually and necessarily be the Support of each other. We have feen the Church in great Danger, when the Enemies of our Constitution in the State have been in Power: and the State has greatly fuffer'd, when the Enemies of our Church have prevail'd. We want not Instances for either of these Proofs, and it is to be hop'd no new Experiment will be made in the one or the other.

The Church of England, let it be consider'd, is not only one Part, and a principal Part of our Constitution; but the Members of that Church are by much the Majority of the People. And therefore, as every repealing of those wholesome Acts and Laws, which at present subsist for the Preservation of that Church, must necessarily be suspected as so many Inlets upon, and be detrimental to Her; so consequently a greater Number of the good People and good Subjects of the Land would be offended and disobliged thereby.

This is too plain to be infifted upon. ---- And thus have I given you some short Hints of the Case, as it stands at present, with regard to the Diffenters, and the Test Act. And I have great Hopes, that as the Members of the Church of England are both by Principle and Interest the truest and best Friends to the Government; and likewise an overbalance in Number to any, I may fay, to all the Diffenters from it; and farther, as we have a King upon the Throne, who is Himself a true Member of that Church, and under Christ the C Head

Head over it, as well as us; fo I cannot doubt, but that all those Laws which the Wisdom of our Legislator has provided for the Security of the Establish'd Religion, will continue in their full Force; that as his Majesty sound us, so he will leave us; so his Royal Successors continue us; and so we shall remain till our Church Militant here on Earth is translated to the Church Triumphant above. Which as it ought to be the Prayer of every true Churchman and of every sincere Lover of Liberty, so in particular it is of,

Your Friend and Servant,

A. B.
